WORKING PAPERS

1. "The Effects of Violence on Inequality in Latin America and the Caribbean: A Research Agenda." Background Paper for the UNDP LAC Regional Human Development Report 2021. UNDP LAC Working Paper Series.
Violence has profound effects on individuals, communities, and countries. It affects mental health, child development, education outcomes, political participation, and social relations. It transforms formal and informal institutions, the quality of governance, public goods provision, and democracy. Yet, these effects do not impact all people equally: gender, race, ethnicity, class, age, and geographic location can determine people's risk of being a victim as well as how severe the consequences are that they will endure. When violence systematically affects the most disadvantaged and vulnerable populations, it can reinforce and amplify inequality. Surprisingly, the causal effect of violence on inequality has received scant attention. This background paper hopes to lay the foundations for a research agenda on the effects of violence on inequality in human development in Latin America and the Caribbean (LAC)—the most violent and most unequal region in the world. By connecting various literatures on the dynamics of violence in LAC with different bodies of work on the effects of violence on individual and collective outcomes, the paper discusses several channels by which violence can perpetuate and amplify various types of inequalities.

2. "The Impact of Political Killings on Democracy and Local Governance: Evidence from Colombia." With Mario Chacon (NYU AD) and Laura García (Notre Dame).

This paper investigates the impact of selective killings of politicians on the quality of local democracy and governance in Colombia. We compile an original dataset on almost 2,000 killings of mayors and municipal council members over the last four decades and estimate the effects of this violence on political participation and the quality of municipal governments. Using municipalities where killing attempts failed as a comparison group, we find that political killings significantly decrease turnout, and undermine local governments' transparency, accountability, and service provision.

3. "The Violent Bias in the Study of Civil War." With Juan Pablo Castilla (Los Andes, Colombia).

The study of civil war has focused, for obvious reasons, on violence. Yet, civil war is about much more than violence. We argue that the focus on violence hinders our understanding of the most common type of armed conflict in the world today. In particular, equating civil war and violence leads to (i) a theoretical bias, whereby scholars overlook other aspects of war that could shape the outcome of interest; and (ii) an empirical bias that assumes, mistakenly, that when we measure violence we are measuring civil war. We illustrate our claims with studies on the Colombian conflict, a case that has been studied by many political scientists and economists. We conclude with ideas on how to move this research program forward.

4. "The Legacies of Civil War on Citizens' Preferences for the Rule of Law." With Juan Camilo Cárdenas (UMASS Amherst), Patricia Justino (WIDER & Institute of Development Studies, UK), Ana María Ibañez (World Bank).

Both scholars and policy makers often assume that civil war erodes citizen support for the rule of law. This is a frequent premise in research and policy debates on post-conflict reconstruction. Yet, the weak preferences for the rule of law of war-torn societies has been assumed rather than investigated. Moreover, the discussion has overlooked the fact that civil war entails different phenomena that could impact citizens' preferences for the rule of law in distinct ways. This paper explores the association between exposure to distinct civil war dynamics and citizen preferences for the rule of law in the post-conflict stage. We focus on citizen support for extralegal measures in order to fight crime---a critical instance of weak support for the rule of law in many Latin American countries, especially those that have recently endured a civil war. We rely on different bodies of work to derive hypotheses on how several dynamics of civil war can impact support for the rule of law, and argue that, theoretically, it is far from clear that civil war should erode support for the rule of law. Using original data on individuals and communities in Colombia, we explore whether living in a conflict zone and experiencing different phenomena during war is associated with weaker support for the rule of law in the post-conflict period. We find that, against common assumptions, those living in a conflict zone are not less likely to exhibit weaker preferences for the rule of law than those who did not endure the presence of armed actors.

Moreover, we find that those who endured more violence and higher levels of disorder and insecurity also fail to support the rule of law less than other individuals. Those living under forms of wartime governance that entailed higher levels of armed group intervention in societal life or greater restrictions to their individual rights and freedoms also fail to report being less supportive of the rule of law in the post-war period. Even those who saw the effective reduction of crime by a guerrilla or paramilitary group fail to exhibit lower support for the rule of law in the aftermath of war. These findings open new avenues of research on the political legacies of war as well as on political behavior. The results also have implications for post-conflict interventions aiming to foster the rule of law and democracy in war-torn societies.

5. “Process-Driven Natural Experiments.” With Silvia Otero (El Rosario University, Colombia)

This paper develops a novel methodology called Process-Driven Natural Experiments (PRODNEs), which combines elements from natural experiments, process-tracing, and small-N comparisons. As in natural experiments, a PRODNE takes advantage of an exogenous shock that randomly assigns a treatment but, in contrast to experiments, it entails the analysis of a small number of cases. Rather than estimating the average treatment effect by comparing treated and non-treated units, PRODNEs rely on within-case analysis on a few units using process-tracing, and comparing the trajectories or causal pathways across cases. We argue that PRODNEs can be useful for both theory-building and theory-testing in various types of research designs that rely on either process-tracing or experiments as the logic of causal inference. In this paper, we explain how PRODNEs relate to other methods and identify their advantages within different research designs. We argue that PRODNEs are an important addition to qualitative, quantitative, and multi-method methods, and allow for exploiting in creative ways the great inferential potential of natural experiments.

6. “Do Rebel and Criminal Governance Thrive Where the State is Weak?”

The literatures on civil war and organized crime argue that rebel and criminal groups thrive in localities where the state is weak. The emphasis is usually on state provision of basic services and security because these two factors are expected to determine civilian cooperation with the state as well as with rebel and criminal groups. Yet, these organizations also obtain the cooperation they need in local territories by becoming de facto rulers. In this paper, I advance two arguments. First, what allows rebels and criminals to rule local populations is not state weakness but poor governance, regardless of its source: high-quality non-state governance can shield communities from the entrenchment of rebel and criminal groups even if the state is absent. This is of particular importance in developing countries because swaths of territory are often governed by non-state authorities. My second argument is that dispute resolution institutions, which have been largely overlooked, are as important as security and service provision because rebels and criminals can more easily consolidate their rule in localities where dispute resolution is highly inefficient or illegitimate. I test this argument as well as the causal mechanisms with original, longitudinal evidence on state capacity, governance, and rebel and criminal rule in areas where political and criminal armed actors have operated in Colombia. The paper has implications for our understanding of rebel and criminal behavior, the evolution of insurgency and organized crime, and policy debates about counterinsurgency, post-conflict reconstruction, and the prevention of organized crime.

7. “An institutionalist approach to civil war recruitment: Evidence from Colombia and Kosovo.”

Why do men and women join non-state armed groups? The literature on this topic provides multiple explanations, and the existing empirical evidence overwhelmingly shows that joiners are driven by very different motivations. Still, we lack a theoretical approach that can reconcile these findings. Moreover, we continue to ignore the conditions under which recruitment is most likely to take place. In this paper, I argue that recruitment is most likely to occur in localities where rebels (or other non-state armed groups) become de facto rulers. Just as institutions shape human choice in peacetime, there are multiple mechanisms by which wartime institutions influence civilians' decision to enlist. I test this argument with data on joiners and non-joiners in two very different civil wars: the Colombian war (1968-2016) and the Kosovo war (1998-1999). The paper provides a framework to explain not only why civilians join armed groups but also where are they most likely to do so. In addition, it offers an explanation of the seemingly contradictory findings of the existing literature. Being the first study of micro-level data on civilians and combatants in more than one conflict, the paper also makes an important empirical contribution to our understanding of participation in civil war.
